A sofa that lives. Inspired by underwater anemones, Tide's responsive ribs compress and slowly reform, turning every sitting into a conversation with furniture. Where form meets behavior, and sculpture becomes seating.

The clownfish resting inside an anemone feels like the clearest image of what “home” means—wild on the outside, completely safe on the inside. That soft, living shield inspired a sofa that looks like a creature of the sea, yet receives you with the same quiet trust. It isn't just a place to sit; it's an underwater embrace translated into furniture.

The sofa is built around a rigid hardwood frame sitting on a walnut-finished plinth, with a sprung or webbed base carrying a thick HR foam seat block.

Dozens of CNC-cut rib cores are then stacked along the frame, each wrapped in high-resilience foam and sculpted into those rounded “anemone” fingers.

Finally, a textured upholstery fabric is pulled tightly over every rib and the base is sanded and finished in matte clear coat, so the whole piece reads as one continuous, sculptural wave.

Foam composition - High-resilience polyurethane foam
Outer coating - bouclé

Wood structure and base - Walnut Wood

A vibrant clownfish with orange and white stripes is swimming within the tentacles of a sea anemone. The anemone has thick, greenish-yellow tentacles in the foreground and more delicate, pinkish ones in the background. The scene is set underwater with a blueish tint.
